DECLASSIFIED EXCISE

members in the front row of delegations. In our case, we were preceded by the Iceland Ambassador and his wife, as well as by the Mali contingent, gay in their native costumes.

Escorted by the Marshal of the Diplomatic Corps, Sir Guy Salisbury Jones, E and I were presented to the Queen. Then I took her in charge to introduce her down the line to twenty of our people. She had something to say to each one, usually asking them how long they had been stationed in London.

She has an attractive manner, and a beautiful complexion. Meanwhile, Prince Philip was being introduced by Lewis Jones, as were the Duke and Duchess of Gloucester. Having finished my initial duty, I then went along with the Princess Royal and the young Duke and Duchess of Kent, through the same procedure. Our people looked [redacted] well, and seemed thoroughly to enjoy the occasion. Afterwards, we mixed around in what had become an enormous crowd. There was champagne and a buffet supper. Even so, we arrived at home, as usual, before our house guests. They came in shortly afterwards, and I made the mistake of sitting up until 2:00 a. m.

I sent off a telegram this morning about my conversation with Home last night, as follows:

DECLASSIFIED EXCISE

Walden Moore, of the Atlantic Union organization, visited me. He has just toured nine European countries, and found everywhere a strong sentiment for having the UK admitted to the Common Market.

We had a dinner at home tonight for the following:

Prince Radziwill
Mr. and Mrs. Stewart Alsop
Mrs. Iain Macleod
Mr. Grierson
Duchess of Buccleuch
Mr. Ian and Lady Caroline Gilmour
Mrs. Leiter
Mr. and Mrs. Braden
Mr. Clark

Iain Macleod and Pamela Berry came in after dinner. Altogether it was a late night. I went to bed at 3:00 a.m.

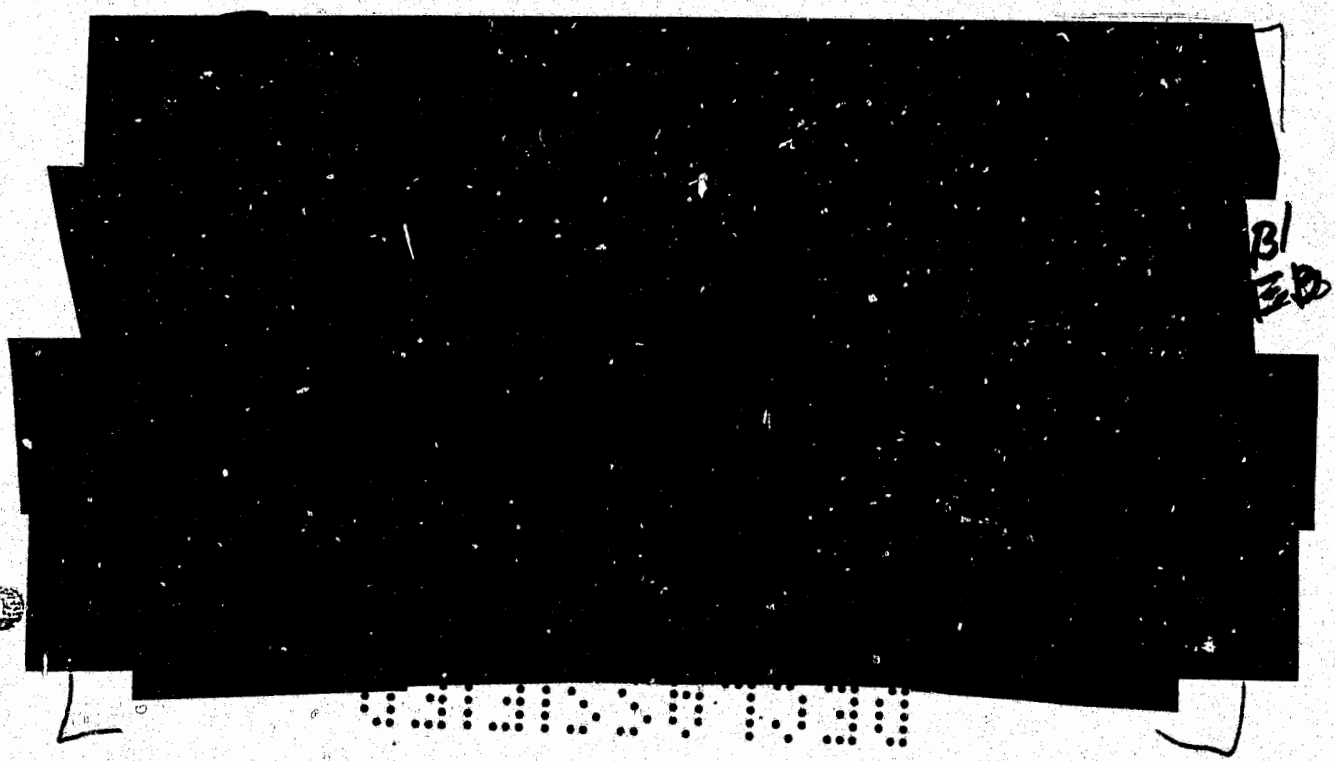
Ted Heath invited me for lunch today at Bucks. We talked at length about the Common Market. I sent off a telegram to George Ball on the subject



DECLASSIFIED

Col. Davies, of Gulf Oil, and Sir Edwin Chapman-Andrews visited me to seek my cooperation for the International Rayon and Synthetic Fibres World Congress to be held in London next May. My old friend, Harry Morgan, called on me. He looks a bit crippled. His father's former house in Grosvenor Square is in process of being torn down, his brother's house on Hill Street was bombed out of existence, and the house at Princes Gate, given by his grandfather to the U. S. Government as an Ambassador's residence, was sold by us when Aldrich moved to Winfield House.

I went down this evening to see Home, at the House of Lords, and sent off the following telegrams:

I was late for a reception held at home in honor of Henry Cabot Lodge, whose selection as Secretary-General of the Atlantic Institute will be announced tomorrow. We had about thirty guests, including the following:
